ASTLEY'S TRANSERRED TO NEW-YORK.

Grand opening of the great Equestrian Troupe,

On MONDAY EVENING, Jan. 16, 1690.

The Proprietor, in offering to the public of New-York his troupe of young and talented artists, long to assure those who honor him with their patronage that the entertainments be proposed to give will be in every respect of the very highest class known to the equestrian profession. The performers brought, out by him to this country—many of whom are of world-wide celebrity—have been selected from the elite of the principal European companies, including the strength of Astley's Royal Amphitheater, London, of which he was the late proprietor. The horses are the most beautiful and thoroughly trained in their art; the troupe of Shetland and Weish Ponies the most intelligent and diminuitive ever introduced in the circle. These, together with his immense wardrobe properties and trappling—magic ring, an improvement above all price—the colossal and gorgeously-decorated chariots, and other coartly paraphersalia, have been brought out in successive steamers at a almost increable outlay, and, happily, with but trifling less.

The proprietor flatters himself that the public will take into consideration the magnitude of his strifling less.

The proprietor flatters himself that the public will take into consideration the magnitude of his father, Thomas Cook, who proceded him, and the many of his father, Thomas Cook, who proceded him, and whese earliest triumples were in the City of New York, some twenty five years ago, and upon whose model the precent troups is organized, may not be forgotten by the admirers of equestriar skill, and that his effects to produce novelty, beinede with refined art and magnificence, may be duly appreciated.

WILLIAM COOK.
